MESD

Master in Education for Sustainable Development

Do you want to lead and motivate others in developing a sustainable, environmentally sound society?

One way to this is to enrol in the Masters in Education for Sustainable Development (MESD) with the Centre for Environmental Education and Research.

The MESD targets those involved in formal, non-formal, and informal educational processes. The main aim of the course is to provide the necessary skills and values so that students may be able to engage and empower others in pro environmental behaviour in the wider society. The course also aims to develop leadership and critical thinking skills, both of which are essential components of sustainability.

The MESD is designed to focus on the main areas of sustainable development, including: environmental challenges, social issues, cultural understanding, and economic resilience.

These areas are discussed through a thematic approach throughout the units of the course and the participants are encouraged to deepen their understanding of these interlinked domains, which are essential to sustainable development.

Applications are invited from individuals who have any first cycle degree with at least second class honours; or any first cycle degree and a minimum of three years relevant experience in a recognised sustainable development setting. Parts of the Masters may be delivered online. The course commences in October 2020.
